Martin Giles

Martin is the US Technology Correspondent of The Economist Newspaper. He is based in San Francisco, from where he covers all aspects of disruptive technologies. Martin has also held a number of other editorial positions at The Economist, including Finance Editor in London, European Business Correspondent in Paris and Management Correspondent in New York.

In between his time on the editorial team of The Economist, he spent ten years on the commercial side of the business, rising to become Executive Vice-President, North America, which involved overseeing all of The Economist Group’s US operations from New York. Martin has also led new business development teams at the company and was a member of The Economist Group’s senior management committee.

Among his other activities, Martin is a member of the Advisory Council of the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London and a trustee of a UK charity that supports students wishing to become financial journalists. He holds an executive MBA from the University of Chicago’s Booth Graduate School of Business and is a graduate of Oxford University.
